

consideration, sought no controversy with the President. So far from it the bill proposed with a view to carry out what was supposed to be the views of the President, and was submitted to him before its introduction into the Senate. I am not about to rely on private declarations of the President. I am not about to say that the American people should know that the President exists between him and Congress in reference to this measure is of his own seeking."

Soon after Congress met it became apparent that there was a difference of opinion between the President and some members of Congress as to the condition of the rebellious States and the rights to be secured to freedmen. The President in his annual message had denied the constitutional power of the general government to extend the right of franchise to negroes, but he had equally decided in favor of the right of every man to life liberty and the pursuit of happiness. This was his language. "But while I have no doubt that now after the close of the war, it is not competent for the general government to extend the franchise in the several States, it is equally clear that good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty and their property."

Feeling the importance of harmonious action between the different departments of the government, and an anxious desire to sustain the President, for whom I had always entertained the highest respect, I had frequent interviews with him during the early part of the session. Without saying anything said by him, I may with perfect propriety say that acting from considerations which I have stated, and believing that the passage of a law by Congress, securing equality in civil rights when denied by state laws, would be in accordance with the wishes of the United States and all other inhabitants of the United States, and in order to relieve anxiety in the North, to induce the southern States to secure these rights by their own action, and thereby to remove many of the obstacles to an early reconstruction, I prepared the bill substantially as now it turns with the President's objections. After its introduction and the bill was printed, a copy was furnished him and in a subsequent period, when it was reported that he was hesitating about signing the Freedmen's Bureau bill he was informed of the condition of the Civil Rights bill then in the House, and a hope was expressed that if he had any objections to any of its provisions, he would make them known to its friends, that they might be remedied if not destructive of the measure; that there was believed to be no disposition on the part of Congress, and certainly no wish my part to have bills presented to him which he would not sign. I never communicated to me, nor so far as I know to any of its friends, the least objection to any of the provisions of the bill till after its passage.

After reciting various acts of the President in the southern States, Mr. Trumbull said:

Is it Congress, by the passing of this bill, or the President, who without law is arrogating to himself far greater powers than any conferred by this bill? Let it not be said that the President exercises those vast powers in his annual messages. He never has a power, and whether over or not, no incidental powers are vested by the Constitution in the President either as President or commander-in-chief of the army. The President great Congress power to make all laws, but he has no power in carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. The President is required in carrying out his powers to act in obedience to the law, the very thing which he refuses to do."

Finally, Mr. Trumbull said:

But, sir, from out of the mouth of Senator Andrew Johnson, the President of the United States, I have heard that the President of the Constitution, if not the letter, in vetoing this bill. It will be remembered that the bill passed both Houses of Congress by more than a two-thirds majority in the Senate being, yeas 33 to yeas 12; in the House, yeas 111 yeas 88. I will read from the veto of the President as I saw Johnson on the steps of the House and by Mr. Buchanan:

"The President of the United States assumes—yes, sir, I say, presumes—do declare to the American people and to the world that he is, in violation of the Constitution, if not the letter, but the spirit of the law, a measure shall not become a law."

Is it this? I ask, is there any difference in the spirit of the Constitution, whether a measure is sanctioned by a two-thirds vote before its passage or afterward? If a measure has been vetoed by the President, it is required that the bill be reconsidered and passed by a two-thirds vote, in order to become a law. But in the teeth of the Executive, there is a two-thirds vote in favor of this bill. A vote was thirty-six to two, in this body, and two Houses have said that this measure is in accordance with the right. In the other House, reflecting the broken Union, the nation, the vote was 112 to 51—between the Constitution requires; and when there is a two-thirds vote for a measure, I say it is against the spirit of the Constitution for the Executive to say "No, you shall not have this measure," will take all the chances of renegeing it."

Apply the language to the facts connected with this bill, and then say who has violated the spirit of the Constitution.

When the Emperor Napoleon has turned over (or no lower theme than the life of Caesar) could be treated by his august pen) all royalties of Europe seem to have been treated with a literary fever. We say by the poet. Omar Pasha is writing a life of Alexander the Great; the Crown Prince of Prussia is writing a history of the Elector; the King of Bavaria is translating the Iliad of Homer; Louis, ex-King of Bavaria, is at Nice, giving the last touch to a volume of Poems; King John, of Saxony, has just published the third and last of his "Dante's Divina Comedia," translated by himself into German; and in Macmillan's Magazine for February there is an article entitled "Boleslaw Casteln," by the Frederic of Schleswig Holstein.

On the decision of the Supreme Court in cases denying the validity of the Reconstruction acts and setting aside their provisions, a great many more new States will be released, some on habeas corpus, others by Presidential pardon, to save trouble of going out the writ. Among these is the subject of one of these cases of alleged frauds at Augusta, Maine, in Concord State Prison, working out a sentence.—[Special to the Boston Herald.]

And now, the members of the present Congress are said to be far more temperate than have composed the National Congress for many years, especially in
